DISCOURSE

ON THE

DEATH OF WASHINGTON.

THE day, Fathers and Friends, which we have fo often delighted to hail and to celebrate, as one of the moft illuftrioufly aufpicious in the annals of our country and of mankind—again returns. But, fad reverfe ! no mutual gratulations, no heartcheering recollections, no gladfome feftivities return with it. The dear MAN who has long lived to God, to his country, and to glory, fhall ever live, in our tendereft affections—in the beft receffes of our hearts. But WASHINGTON was mortal ! The anniverfary of his birth we fhall no more celebrate, but in memory of " joys that are paft." Alas ! it is fuperfeded, in our country's calendar, by the fatal fourteenth of December !—a day, the recollection of which,

which, will long agonize the heart, and fadden the countenance of every virtuous American.

Still there is left us the mournful pleafure of paying to diffinguifhed excellence its merited honors, and of pouring our filial tears to the dear memory of our deceafed Father. Bleffed be God ! we are not forbidden to weep. On fuch an occasion, it is a precious privilege. It will give fome relief from the mighty burden of our forrow. And our hearts when foftened may receive a deeper impression of the virtues we thus honor.

Our country mourns. The breach, wide as the fea, with which her God, awful though juft in his difpleafure, has afflicted her, is felt, is tenderly lay mented through all her tribes. Her widely diftant fhores echo and reecho the voice of undiffembled mourning. This day exhibits a fcene probably new to the world—a numerous and far extended nation infpired by one all-attracting, all-cementing principle of fentimental forrow, and fpontaneoufly pouring forth a flood of heart-felt grief at the tomb of a Man univerfally acknowledged its chief fupport and its brighteft ornament.

Come then, let us mingle our fympathetic forrows with the forrows of our bleeding Country. Let us refign our fouls to the foft fentiments which the occasion fo powerfully infpires. Let our hearts refpond fpond to the accents of mourning conveyed to us by every passing gale; while every tongue, in unifon with the language of millions is ready to adopt the tender exclamation : MY FATHER! MY FATHER ! THE CHARIOT OF ISRAEL, AND THE HORSEMEN THEREOF! (2 Kings, 2. 12.)

Such was the fhort, but comprehensive and pathetic eulogy which, on the miraculous tranflation of the prophet Elijah, in a chariot of fire, flowed warm from the heart of the afflicted Elifha. His own particular lofs was great. He was bereaved of the Inftructor and Guide of his youth. He was fuddenly deprived of one who by his tendernefs and watchful care, added to his fuperior age, authority and knowledge, had attracted his filial reverence and affection. But his perfonal affliction, deep and diffreffing as it was, did not abforb his fense of the public calamity. He mourned for his country. He mourned that her ftrength, that the principal inftrument of her protection and fafety was removed-for in this light he viewed the exemplary character, the pious counfels, the faithful warnings and the prevalent interceffions of the now departed prophet. These were the chariot of Ifrael. and its borfemen : far fuperior indeed to all its martial inftruments, preparations, and achievements.

Unfpeakably important and beneficial to a community is every pious perfon it contains. Such are truly the pillars of its firength and the fhield of of its defence. But peculiarly entitled to this defcription are those whose unfullied purity of character and acknowledged superiority of wisdom, joined to eminence of station, have acquired for them an extensive sphere of influence. Such a combination of qualities and advantages falls to the lot of few. But these few are precious. Their uprightness, their fagacity, their influence, their prayers, are better than weapons of war. And though they should never enter the martial field, nor personally converse with the toils and dangers of war, still they are their country's champions and protectors.

How preeminent then in this fublime office and employment is he who to all which has been already defcribed, adds the fkill, the bravery, the fortitude, the experience of the finished Soldier and General!

I perceive, my mourning friends, you already anticipate the application of this affecting paffage to the occafion of our prefent grief; to the Man who may now emphatically and with the moft undifputed propriety be ftyled immortal—the revered and beloved WASHINGTON. And do not your full hearts declare that you have never feen nor heard of the man, nor, excepting in the facred records, ever met with the delineation of the character, to whom fuch a eulogy fo juftly belongs ?

WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON was our Father. For his country, he felt more than the affection, the tendernefs, the care and folicitude of a parent. Her intereft, her happinels feemed ever uppermost in his heart, in his wifhes and in his prayers. To her protection and comfort he gave the fprightly energy of his youth, the matured vigor and wifdom of his manhood, the cares and counfels of his age : and all with a cheerfulness which imparted a double value to the gift. Recollect the coftly facrifices he has made and the imminent hazards he has encountered; recollect his nights of watching and his days of toil; recollect efpecially the precious Legacy he has left you, drawn from the rich ftores of his fertile mind and extensive observation; breathing too the tendereft affection of his heart-and own that he was indeed your Father .-- But the tender confeffion has long fince been made by an affectionate people. Millions of tongues, the faithful interpreters of millions of hearts, have united in it. And this day, while it folemnly feals, indelibly records it. For what means the universal affembling of this day ? What mean the folemn rites this moment cel. ebrated in every part of our country ?. Is this the cold, formal homage of ceremony? Is it the abject, reluctant tribute of vaffal fubmiffion, extorted to grace the exit of fome defpot, who has lived without affection, and died without regret ? No. It is the fpontaneous effusion of feelings too ftrong to be fupprefled, and almost too overwhelming to be fupported. ported. It is a nation of freemen, animated with one foul, heaving one figh, preft with one forrow, mourning a common Father, and feeking relief and confolation in the temple of God.

WASHINGTON was likewife, in an important fense, our Arength and protection. Let this be recognifed, not by way of fervilely flattering or impioufly idolizing a creature, but in grateful commemoration of diffinguished excellence and usefulness, and in humble honor to that merciful Being who has indulged us, in one of our own feeble race, fuch an illustrious instrument of His beneficence and guardian care. It was His transcendent favor to our Nation which raifed us up fuch a Hero, fuch a Sage, fuch a Man : which enriched him with an understanding fo capacious, and with a heart still more large and expansive; which inspired his bofom with the fublime ambition to ferve and fave his country, and which crowned this first, last, and favorite with of his foul with the most fingular fuccefs.

It were eafy to illustrate this point, and to fhew, in distinct and regular detail, how eminently he was the fafeguard and strength of our country, by his great achievements, by his fage counfels, by his illustrious example, by his unparalleled influence, and (bleffed be God ! we may add) by his devout prayers. But on an occasion so tender, the task of formal discustion fion and the rigid reftraints of method would but ill accord with your feelings or my own. Let us then in a more defultory way, range this capacious field, and fix our minds for a moment on fome of the moft confpicuous objects it prefents. Let us indulge fome brief contemplations calculated to imprefs us with a lively idea of the rich treafure, the comprehensive bleffing which once was ours. If there is pain in the employment, it is a pain nearly allied to pleafure. Inftruction too, and benefit, of great importance may be the refult.

At a very early period of life did the future Guardian of his country give fome intimation of that fagacity and comprehension of mind, that correctness of judgment, that force of genius and dignity of character which have long fince been the admiration of the world. Commissioned, about the age of twenty-one, to examine the encroachments made by the French on the western frontiers of these then British colonies, and to remonstrate against them, he more than juftified fo fingular an appointment by executing its important duties with an accuracy and addrefs far beyond his years. A fcene which opened not long after, was perilous and diffrefsful indeed. But it fignalized the more confpicuoufly the military talents of our youthful Hero, now commanding a regiment * under General Braddock. In a conteft B

* Such is the current of accounts. By fome, however, it has teft with the Indians equally ill-judged and difaftrous, that brave but too rafh and pertinacious officer fell, with great part of his army. The honor of faving the remainder was allotted to WASHING-TON, who with a most remarkable intrepidity, fkill and fuccess, conducted their retreat.

Heaven that enriched him with fuch rare endowments, prepared in due time a theatre adequate to their complete difplay. Nor is it furely one of the fmalleft glories of our late Revolution, that it had fuch a fhare in developing and difplaying to mankind a character which has irrefiftible claims to be loved, and the love of which is clofely connected with every virtue.

has been afferted that Col, Washington had previously refigned his commission, in confequence of some arrangements respecting rank, which he viewed as degrading to the colonial officers; and that he was now attending Gen. Braddock as a volunteer and an extraordinary Aid.

† This memorable retreat was particularly noticed by the pious and excellent Mr. Davies, afterwards Prefident of New-Jerfey College ; who took occafion from it to "point out to the public that heroic youth, Col. Wafhington—whom," he adds, "I cannot but hope Providence has hitherto preferved in fo fignal a manner, for fome important fervice to his Country ;"—a remark which when we confider the early period at which it was made, and the fingular verification it afterwards received, appears little lefs than prophetic.

Never can this momentous Revolution be contemplated by a feeling American, but with mingled fentiments of gratitude and aftonishment. The grandeur and boldnefs of its defign could be equalled by nothing but the wonders which marked every ftep of its progrefs, and the triumphant fuccefs with which it was finally crowned. Well may its recollection excite the humble yet exulting acknowledgment: If it had not been the LORD who was on our fide, when men rofe up against us : then they had fwallowed us up quick, when their wrath was kindled against us. Then the waters had overwhelmed us, the Aream had gone over our foul. Our belp was in the name of the LORD, who made beaven and earth.* He graciously inspired us with a love of liberty, equal to every exertion, and fuperior to every danger. His kindly influence transfused the facred flame from heart to heart, till this whole nation refolved to vindicate its violated rights, or perifh in the attempt. He revealed, in various ways, his mighty and merciful arm for our help and falvation. He gave us a WASHINGTON -the man we wanted-and perhaps the only man on earth capable of meeting the high and extensive demands of fo awful a crifis. The voice of his Country calling him to the command of her armies, he obeyed with promptnefs, yet with a felf-diffidence which forms a beautiful counterpart to the ability, the vigor and fuccefs of his following exertions.-Many of you, my hearers, recollect what a general and and animating confidence was infpired by his firft appearance at Cambridge : and you know how faithful was the correspondence between an increasing display of his character, and the increased confidence, love and veneration of his countrymen. His virtues and talents, his character and influence, feemed the chief support, the very vital principle of our Revolution; and for many an anxious year did we confider the political falvation of our country as depending on him, fo far as it could be dependent on a mortal man.

Wonderful indeed were the perplexities, the diftreffes, the perils and discouragements which affailed him during a hard and doubtful conteft of eight But far more wonderful the refources of his vears. mighty mind which they called forth, and the unfhrinking courage, the determination, the perfever, ance by which they were encountered and finally overcome. With an army imperfectly disciplined, inconftantly fupplied, and every moment, as it were, trembling to its diffolution, he confronted and vanquifhed the forces of one of the most potent and formidable nations on earth, and obtained, with the acknowledgment of our independence, a peace far more advantageous than at the beginning of the ftruggle we dared hope. Who fees not that a greater than WASHINGTON was here ?--- that a just and gracious GOD fupported our caufe, and gave to our feeble exertions his own refiftlefs energy ?

The

The diffinguished Minister of his beneficence difmiffes with his paternal bleffing an army which he might have easily made the instrument of ambition and aggrandizement, commits his dear delivered country to the care of Heaven, and retires to his beloved Vernon, crowned with glory, purfued by the prayers and bleffings of an affectionate people, rewarded by their gratitude, and happy in their happines.

But half the purpose for which he was indulged to his country and to the world—perhaps the greater half—was yet unaccomplished. In the memorable Convention of 1787, WASHINGTON appeared and presided. There we find him, in union with the affembled fages of the land, laying plans for the fecurity and perpetuation of that liberty which his valor had defended; forming and maturing a scheme of government of which his fagacious mind had long fince perceived the necessfity, and his mafterly hand almost traced the outlines.*

The excellence of this conftitution, its benign afpect on all the most precious interests of our country, its effects, incalculably important and beneficial, have long fince been realized and generally confessed. Yet so various and powerful was the opposition it encountered, so permicious were the jeal-usies and divisions of that most alarming period, that had it not not been fheltered and recommended by the name of WASHINGTON, its bleffings might have been forever loft to us. All thanks to that beneficent Providence which fent us this fecond national falvation by the fame beloved hand which brought the firft !

And what mingled fentiments of delight, gratitude and veneration were excited in our hearts by the aufpicious news that he who had defended us in war, was about to rule us in peace !---that again fummoned by a country whofe voice he could never hear but with veneration and love, he had condefcended to give the evening of his days to the promotion of her happinefs ! Yet who dared confider it as within the fphere of probability that his preeminence in the cabinet could equal his glory in the field ?

The event, however, difappointed every fear, and more than realized our moft fanguine hopes. WASHINGTON was in a new fphere : but he was ftill the fame. The fame correctnefs and penetration of mind, the fame calmnefs in deliberation, promptitude of decifion and energy of action, the fame eagle-eyed vigilance and invincible perfeverance, the fame ftern integrity and glowing love of country, which had rendered his military life fo glorious, attended him to the cabinet.

How well, how fuccefsfully he difcharged the arduous and complicated duties of a first and fecond Prefidency, Prefidency, needs not now be told. It has been clearly read in the flourifhing flate of our country, in the flability of our public credit, in the rapid increafe of our commerce and wealth during those periods, and in our remarkable prefervation from the most awful dangers threatening us both from within and without. It has been loudly proclaimed by the plaudits of the wife and good throughout the world. It has been flrikingly manifested by the general flatisfaction and happiness of this favored people during his administration, and by their pungent regret at his retirement from office, and from this mortal fcene.

From the political fphere, however, he did not retire, without leaving us his fatherly benediction. Nor from the world, until he had given the crown, ing evidence how near to his heart was his country's happinefs. Will it be thought the dictate of a fan. ciful fingularity to fuggest that the most glorious act even of WASHINGTON, was his acceptance of his last appointment to the command of our armies ?---When we faw him voluntarily retire, loaded with honors, from the highest office in his country's gift, we naturally judged it impoffible that a character fo exalted fhould attain any additional elevation. But his great foul difcovered a way. He rofe by descending. Nor can it be doubted that this unparalleled inftance of condescension was the result of that disinterestednefs of virtue which is its higheft glory. For what private private advantage could there be to allure to the martial field him who had already gathered all the laurels it could beftow, and had long fince been repofing under their fhade ? None, my brethren. Nor can you furely contemplate his venerable form again expofing itfelf to the perils of war, his breaft again bared to receive the weapons aimed at his country's peace, without the most unutterable emotions of affectionate reverence.

But we are come to a fcene still more affecting. The exit of a good man is furely one of the most animating, though awful spectacles which the world can prefent. That of WASHINGTON was sudden —But let me retract the thought—

-And his life appeared to be a fcene of conftant preparation for death; of uninterrupted, vigorous devotion to the fervice of God and his fellow-creatures. Approach then, if you can fuftain the thought, and contemplate a moment the dying bed of WASHINGTON! Behold him calm—undifmayed—felf-collected—fuftaining the moft agonizing diftrefs without a groan—fubmiffively yielding his fpirit to his God—not afraid to die—majeftic in death. -But the fcene is too overwhelming. Let us retire. And while its impreffion is recent, let us briefly ruminate

[&]quot; No death is fudden to a foul prepar'd,

[&]quot;When God's own hour brings always God's reward"-- minate on some of the many virtues of this wonderful man.

The ruling paffion of his foul, if we may judge from a review of every part of his life-I had almost faid, of its every action and circumftance, was Patriotifm. He feemed to live only for his country. To her happines he delighted to subordinate every other confideration. The facrifices he made to this favorite object were innumerable and immenfe. His refufal of any compensation for his public fervices, and this uniformly perfifted in, rare as the inftance is, and worthy commemoration, feems yet in WASHINGTON to have been among the smaller expressions of patriotism. Sacrifices far more coftly to a foul like his, he continually made. The fweets of retirement, to which he was peculiarly attached, and the fatisfactions of domestic life, he habitually refigned at the call of his country. And there were periods when his character and popularity feemed at ftake: when the hafty decifions and temporary clamors of injudicious or unprincipled men came directly in competition with his own fense of the public good. In these cases, he coolly held on his way, leaving to time and reafon the justification of his conduct. Nay, ingratitude itfelf, and calumny could not extinguish nor confine the facred flame which glowed in his breaft.

Ð

Nor

Nor did this fire confume any of those more expanfive fenfibilities which should live in the human bofom. His patriotifm was connected with the most enlarged Philanthropy, and the kindeft fentiments of Humanity. He felt for the diftreffes of man. He mitigated, fo far as in his power, the feverities of He fympathized in the diftreffes of the prifonwar. er caft by Providence on his care. And while his firm hand has executed the dictates of justice, the tear of mercy has trembled in his eye. To his flaves, whom he was under a partial neceffity of detaining, he was rather a Father than a Master, as appears from his late Will. And bear witnefs, you who feel-exquifitely feel-yet for none but yourfelves-you who never made a facrifice to the comfort of an inferior domestic, bear witness-that the precious life of WASHINGTON was probably facrificed to his reluctance to difturb the repose of a menial fervant.

There was in this man a Delicacy of mind which never forfook him : a certain inftinctive and exquifite fenfe of the fit, the proper, the decorous—independent of reafoning—more correct than the niceft rules of art—prompting him in all circumftances and on every occafion, to fay and do the very thing he fhould—and often no lefs confpicuous to the difcerning mind in what he left undone and unfaid. Doubtlefs this natural elegance of mind received much much additional refinement from the moral and Chriftian fentiments fo familiar to him.

In his character, nothing perhaps was more remarkable than a genuine and most exemplary Humility. And furely never was the humility of a mortal more frequently or more thoroughly put to the teft than his-raifed, as he was, to the higheft dignities his country could beftow, and conftantly prefented not only with the tribute of just encomium, but the incense of extreme adulation. But amid all, he never appeared to forget himfelf, nor to grow giddy with fancied elevation. While his admiring Country thought that no attentions, no honors, fit to be bestowed on a mortal, were too much to offer, fcarcely any thing of this kind appeared to him too little. Most of us remember his visit to these parts, foon after his election to the Prefidency-how his prefence gladdened every heart, cheered every face and drew from all defcriptions of perfons the ftrongeft poffible testimonials of respect and veneration. But the fcene feemed evidently rather to deprefs than to elevate him. A crowning evidence of the fame humble fpirit is exhibited in his laft Teftament, in which he declares his express defire that his corpfe "may be interred in a private manner, without parade, or funeral oration."

His felf-government in other refpects was fcarcely lefs extraordinary. His mind feemed always on the throne, throne, fwaying an abfolute fceptre over his appetites and paffions. What to fome appeared extreme referve and even aufterity in his deportment, was probably the dictate of principle; the fruit of a juft conviction that to his character and flation there was neceffary a dignity not compatible with the most unreferved communication. And remarkably on all occasions was this dignity fupported. It had indeed a firm and folid basis. It was built not on pride and arrogance, but on preeminent worth and unaffected modesty.

He pofieffed a Magnanimity which, as it rendered him fuperior to ingratitude and injury, faved him likewife from undue elation in profperity, and from defpondency in trial. "I have feen him," fays his great compatriot ADAMS, "in the days of adverfity, in fome of the fcenes of his deepeft diffrefs and moft trying perplexities—I have alfo attended him in his higheft elevation and moft profperous felicity—with uniform admiration of his wifdom, moderation and conftancy." Scarcely could a higher eulogium be pronounced on a mortal, or a more unequivocal evidence fuggefted of a truly great and well-balanced mind,

In fhort, there appeared in WASHINGTON a purity of heart and a uniformity of character, which placed him alone among the great ones of the earth; or rather which caufed their greatness to dwindle into infignificance. His foul was fuperior to the thousand arts and littleneffes which have difgraced the characters of most of the celebrated. politicians of Europe. Nay more, he attained an immenfe fuperiority over those generals and statefmen who have been confidered in the world as men of virtue. And if the caufe of this be enquired for, I confess, my brethren, there appears to me but one which is at all fufficient ; and this, when maturely weighed, will be found thoroughly adequate to the effect. He was, as there are the most cogent reafons to believe, a CHRISTIAN-a man of prayereminently fo-one who lived and acted in the fear of GOD, and under an impreflive fense of his heartfearching eye-one who humbly proftrated his foul at the feet of the divine SAVIOR-who derived his best fentiments from His gospel-and exhibited a bright illustration of His bleffed and heavenly spirit. Can it be fuppofed, that a man who appeared at the farthest possible distance from dislimulation; who never fpoke nor acted without a meaning; whofe profession of Christianity was yet to explicit, whole attendance on its inftitutions fo conftant and uniform; fo full apparently of reverence and affection; whole temper and life were likewife fo ftrikingly correspondent-was not at heart a Christian ? This, this appears at once the foundation and the crown of all his greatness and glory. In this point of view principally, he was a mighty bulwark to our country. His prayers made an important part of our national tional defence. His excellent fpirit and pious example were calculated to flash conviction in the face of all the proud infidels in our land. The humble yet fublime, the benevolent and godlike principles which actuated this Chriftian Hero, would raife a blufh on the cheeks of the ambitious conquerors and deftroyers of nations -if ambition could blufh. His character, my brethren, is full of inftruction to us all : and He who gave us fuch a character. He who has placed fuch a rare affemblage of virtues before our eyes, most justly, most folemnly requires, that we notice it, to His honor and for our own imitation. Nor let it be confidered as the hafty effusion of an ill-boding mind-'tis an apprehenfion fanctioned by my cooleft thought-that fhould the period ever arrive (gracious Heaven forbid it (hould !) when the name and virtues of WASHINGTON shall excite no lively vibrations of fenfibility, no tender feelings of gratitude, in the bofoms of Americans, it will be the period of our country's degradation. It will argue fuch a depravation of fentiment, fuch a dereliction of principle, as will but too certainly indicate and feal our national infamy and ruin.

You will not most affuredly confider me as reprefenting the character to be wholly faultles. This is not the lot of humanity. And far be from me fuch injustice to my own species as to rob it of so bright an ornament, by representing WASHING-TON as an Angel. We claim him as a Man : nor will will we relinquifh the claim.—Befide, who could be more ready than he was, to confefs and feel his own dependence, frailty, and liability to error? Who more ready than he, on all occafions, to elude the notice and encomiums of a fond Country, and to point its attention and gratitude to an overruling and beneficent Providence:—to deprefs himfelf, that he might exalt his God?—Nor probably is there a perfon living whofe ears and heart can be more wounded by those incautious and unhallowed extravagancies which, in too many inftances, have been fcattered over his grave, than his would be, were he within their reach.

Let us not then think ourfelves excufed, nor let us be deterred, from rendering to the deceafed Savior* and ornament of his country, a juft tribute of affectionate regard and celebration. Methinks befide his tomb, Virtue weeps, and Religion herfelf becomes a mourner. The furrounding world takes a lively intereft in the fcene. Is there an American who can behold it unmoved ? Surely, he must be far above, or far below the level of humanity.

For him who is gone, we truft we have no reafon to mourn. For ourfelves and our country we have much. If, as Infpiration declares, the righteous are taken taken away from the evil to come ; if pious and patris otic fouls are feafonably fnatched from those calamities which they would feel lefs for themfelves than for others, what have we not reafon to apprehend when fuch a Friend and Father is called home? My brethren, we have never yet realized-God grant we may not be taught by bitter experience !--- how important has been the protection afforded our Country amid the ftorms of Europe, by the very name of WASHINGTON, and by the confciousnes, fo diffeartening to the enemies of our peace, that he lived, that he was ready again to gird on his faithful fword in defence of our rights. Nor have we yet completely made the momentous experiment, how effentially neceffary was his life and influence to our federal union and internal tranquillity. And is there not too much reason to fear that vice and infidelity, long fo mournfully prevalent among us, will have a new triumph, now fuch an illustrious champion and ornament of virtue and religion is removed ?

* The application of this term to a human, infrumental Deliverer, is juftified by the literal expressions of holy writ; as may be feen in Nehemiah 9. 27, and other passages.

Still let us implicitly fubmit to the fovereignty of Him whofe pavilion is darknefs, whofe way is in the fea, whofe judgments are unfearchable, whofe holy difpleafure at our national fins, and effectively our ungrateful abufe of the most fignal mercies, is yet but too confpicuous in this distreffing dispensation.

Shall

Shall we not likewife on this occasion, mournful as it is, endeavor to realize anew our multiplied reasons to be thankful, that fuch an illustrious character has been raifed up, has been so long lent to our unworthy land, has been made fuch an inftrument of mercy and fuch an inftructive example to this people, has continued gloriously uniform to the last? Let us bless God that we have had a WASHINC-TON to mourn over; for ages and centuries might not have afforded us the precious privilege.

Let us never ceafe to bear on our hearts and in our prayers his eminently virtuous Relict, whofe late Letter, the expression of her foul, proves her a kindred and congenial spirit—worthy the heart of the first of men. May that power and mercy which knows no confinement, give her support, great as her loss, and heartfelt as her affliction !

And fhall not the venerable ADAMS, who now feels himfelf alone, bereaved of his laft brother, be remembered by us with new tendernefs and folicitude? While we are permitted to contemplate the mantle and the fpirit, with the office of his afcended predeceffor, as refting on him (as did those of Elijah on Elifha) let us be thankful that a loss which we were ready (perhaps too ready) to confider as irreparable, has been fo munificently fupplied. And let us ardently fupplicate the continuance of his life, his energies and ufefulnefs.

Does

Does not the mournful event we now contemplate, call on us in loud and folemn accents, to ceafe from man, whofe breath is in his noftrils, whofe glory is as the flower of grafs; to beware of an unlimited dependence on a frail mortal, however eminent in virtue, in flation and ufefulnefs? Does it not with a kind of irrefiftible eloquence plead with us to concenter our affections, our hope and confidence in the everlafting and unchangeable GOD; the fupreme Beauty and the fupreme Good; the Refuge and Dwelling-place of his people in all calamities, in all generations?

Is the hoary, the venerable head of WASHING-TON brought down to the duft of death ? Then, my Fathers, prepare to die! Could not his illuftrious character, his exalted virtue, his diftinguished usefulness, his unrivalled glory; could not the wiss and prayers of his country; could not the admiration and reverence of mankind obtain for him fo much as a momentary reprieve from the arrest of the Heaven-commissioned Messenger? Then where is the favored mortal that can claim it? Where the thoughtless creature that dares expect it ?

Is it our confoling hope that while earth is fo greatly impoverished by the loss of fo much excellence, Heaven is proportionably enriched by its acceffion ? Let this operate as a new and potent attractive of our affections to that bleffed place. Thither, as to its proper region, its only lafting abode, afcends all that is worth our beft love and warmeft admiration. Let then the man who attracted and poffeffed our hearts while here, carry them with him to the world of perfect purity and unmingled blifs.

Do we, my dear brethren, feel almost oppressed with a fense of immense obligation to the Benefactor whom God has taken from us? Be it then our endeavor to

" difcharge

- " The gratitude and duty which we owe him,
- " By laying up his counfels in our hearts."

Read his Legacy. There is the wifdom, the counfel, the heart, the foul of your WASHINGTON. There are the precious rules for making our nation wife and great and happy. Treafure it in your memories. Let it live in your hearts. Let it fhine in your conduct. And from the moment that your children begin to lifp the honored name of their country's Father, endeavor to prepare their minds for the reception of thefe invaluable maxims; that they may be handed down to the lateft pofterity.

My youthful friends; if you do not perceive in the character of your deceafed Guardian and Father, an infinite fuperiority to the most accomplished pupil of Chefterfield—to the most finished difciple of the witty witty but deteftable Voltaire,* that "brighteft, meane/f of mankind;" your tafte muft be depraved and compaffionable indeed. Let me befeech you to eye and feduloufly to imitate the character of this man, fo truly accomplifhed, yet fo pure and fimple in his manners; fo dignified, yet fo humble in his mind; fo rational a philofopher, and fo exemplary a Chriftian. It will lead you to true glory. It will conduct you, we may confidently hope, to everlafting felicity.

* Should any think there is an indecorum in using a flyle of reprehension fo severe, concerning one of the most brilliant geniufes of his age, they are defired to reflect that his uncommon powers of mind were, by a depravity of heart still more uncommon, profituted to the bafeft purposes, and that his whole life was little elfe than a courfe of inveterate, fystematic and too fuccefsful hostility against religion. In ordinary cafes, it is confessed, humanity enjoins our filence concerning the dead, if we cannot speak in their praise. But the name of Voltaire can never be forgotten. The ravages his writings have made on human virtue and happiness, the execrations of thoufands and millions whofe perdition they have effected, must but too effectually fecure him from that oblivion to which every benevolent mind would with to confign him. And humanity itfelf imperioufly claims that fuch an illustrious mak factor of the human race be held up as an object of deteftation and horror. Would to Heaven this monition might be regarded by those for whose fakes it is given ! Would to Heaven the last scene of this hardy champion of infidelity-a fcene of terror, anguifh and defpair fcarcely ever paralleledmight prove an antidote against the pollonous influence of his writings !

Let us all remember, that this mournful celebration of the natal day, the life and death of the firft of patriots, lays us under new obligations to love our country. What hypocrify, if after this folemn profeffion of regard to his character and memory, any of us fhould be found oppofing, or but half befriending the intereft fo dear to his heart, fo uniformly the object of his life! While we mufe on the bright example he has fet us, fhall there not be enkindled in our bofoms a flame of patriotifun fo pure, fo vigorous, as fhall confume every meaner affection, and triumph over every oppofing intereft ?

I would clofe with a thought ftill more calculated, if poffible, to come home to all our bofoms. We have affembled this day to pay honor to diffinguished human virtue; to the memory of a deceafed earthly Benefactor. Have we ever paid our honors to that Eternal Source of excellence, compared with which all human worth is but as a feeble twinkling ray of light, to the unbounded fplendors of the glorious orb of day? Have our fouls ever afcended in love and gratitude to Him who is the unfathomable and overflowing ocean whence all our ftreams of comfort are fupplied ? While our hearts blefs the virtues and memory of WASHINGTON, are their best and tenderest affections given to Him who made him fach, and who made him ours ?-If this is not the cafe, we are chargeable with inconfiftency indeed-inconfiftency, the very thought of which fhould fhould be enough to cover our faces with fhame, and fill our hearts with forrow. May God in mercy fave us from it ! May He give us hearts to love true goodnefs, wherever it is found, but chiefly in its. Source ! May He unite our fouls to all that is excellent in his creatures, and render their excellencies inftrumental to attract and everlaftingly bind us to the glorious CREATOR !

HYMN.

O GOD! thy darkeft ways are juft : Mute we adore thine awful hand, Which lays our glory low in duft, And fpreads difinay around the land.

Yet O! indulge our mighty grief; Forgive the fighs that heave our breaft; Forgive thefe tears—a fad relief— Thefe tears that will not be repreft.

We weep our Father, Guardian, Friend, Late from our bleeding bofoms torn. Lo! millions feel the wound, and bend In anguifh o'er his hallow'd urn.

Nor

Nor wilt thou frown while thus we pay Affection's tribute, Virtue's meed : When WASHINGTON thou tak'ft away, Thou bid'ft our hearts with forrow bleed.

With pity's eye behold our tears ; Let mercy's balm affuage our woe ; Becalm the tempeft of our fears, And fhield us ftill from ev'ry foe.

Long may our Father's honors bloom, His virtues on each heart impreft ! His Country's bofom be his tomb, And diftant nations call him bleft !
