An Dration

ON THE DEATH OF

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL GEORGE WASHINGTON,

LATE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Delivered at CHARLESTON, (S. C.) January 15, 1800, at the Request of the Inhabitants.

BY DAVID RAMSAY, M. D.

IF ever any country owed to one of its citizens an incalculable debt of gratitude, that country is the United States, that citizen was the late George Washington. To do justice to his exalted merit, far exceeds my abilities. In making the attempt, I must furely fail, for none could succeed. I not only crave, but claim your indulgence. The task on which I am entering is of your appointment, and it is of such a delicate and arduous nature, that to its proper execution, not only my feeble powers, but the first abilities in the world would be inadequate.

On the 11th of February, 1732, Virginia had the honour of giving birth to the illustrious man, whose death we this day deplore. His ancestors migrated from England, and were among the first settlers of this first of the British provinces in America. I cannot speak from positive anecdote, what was his situation and employment for the first twenty years of his life; but I have heard, that in his youth he was remarkably grave, silent, and thoughtful, active and methodical in business, highly dignified in his appearance and manners, and strictly honourable in all his deportment.

The first public notice of him, that I have feen, was in a note to a sermon, printed in London forty-five years ago, which had been preached a short time before, in Hanover-county, Virginia, on fome public occafion, by the late Prefident Davies. In this, the preacher observed, "I may point out to the public that heroic youth, Colonel Washington, whom I cannot but hope, Providence has hitherto preserved for some important service to his country." As no thought of American Independence was entertained at that early day, this observation could only have been sounded in a knowledge of his talents and character. Indeed his appearance would have justified such a presentiment, for majesty and dignity were remarkably conspicuous in his countenance, and the figure of his person.

Very foon after young Washington was twentyone years of age, he was employed by the government of Virginia, on an embaffy to negociate the removal of fome French fettlers from the Ohio, who had fortified themselves in the vicinity of that river, on lands claimed by the King of Great-Britain. In the execution of this trust, he travelled upwards of four hundred miles, and his route, for one half of that distance, led through pathlefs woods, inhabited only by favage beafts and more favage men. He was attended only by one companion, and proceeded on foot from Winchester: his negociations failing, Virginia raifed three hundred men, and put them under his command, and instructed him to proceed to the Ohio. An engagement took place, between the French and Virginians, in which the former were at first defeated; but being afterwards reinforced with nine hundred men, they reduced Colonel WASHINGTON, after making a brave defence, to the necessity of submitting to honourable terms of capitulation.

The contest, about these lands, becoming more serious, General Braddock was sent with a regular force from Great-Britain, to support the claims of his Britannic Majesty. His impetuous valour pushed him forward into an ambuscade of French and Indians, in which he was killed, and his army routed. The remains of it were rallied, and brought off in safety, under the direction and by the address of Colonel Wash-

The next expedition was more fuccessful, and reftored tranquillity to the province of Virginia. When this event took place, the young citizen soldier, being no longer called to the discharge of military duty, refumed his habits of civil life, and continued therein, until a new and unexpected scene, about twenty years after, brought him forward on a much more conspicuous theatre.

In the year 1774, the British ministry completed their fystem for taxing their Colonies. America was roused; and, by a simultaneous impulse, formed a Congress of her most enlightened sons, to devise such measures as bid fairest to preserve her endangered liberties. To this illustrious affembly WASHINGTON was deputed, and he contributed his full proportion in forming the wife plans which were by them adopted. Great-Britain turned a deaf ear to their petitions, and proceeded to coerce the Colonies by a military force. Massachusetts being immediately attacked, had, in the first instance, embodied an army for its defence; but as foon as it was determined to make a common cause with that much injured province, it became necessary that her local army should be made the army of the United Colonies, and be officered by Congress.

New-England had her Pomeroy, her Ward, and her Putnam, and many others who had feen as much, or perhaps more fervice than Washington; yet their wife delegates concurred in elevating the Virginian over their own favourite fons. The appointment of a commander in chief of all the armies raifed, or to be raifed, was effected by an unanimous vote, and without competition. Not only Congress, but the inhabitants in every part of the United Colonies, feemed, by one consent, to point to Washington, as the chosen inftrument of Heaven, to guide them, through the storms of war, to the haven of peace and safety. His native modefly begat diffrusts in his own breast, from which others were free.

In his acceptance of the office, he defired, "that it might be remembered by every gentleman prefent, that he declared, with the utmost fincerity, that he did not think himself equal to the command with which he was honoured."

On the third of July, 1775, he arrived at Cambridge, and entered upon the duties of his high station. Great were the difficulties which preffed on the new commander in chief. To introduce discipline and subordination among the free hufbandmen, who had lately affumed the military character, and who were accuftomed to act from the impulse of their own minds, was an arduous labour. To procure effective fervice from men who carry with them the spirit of freedom into the field, requires virtues which are rarely found in military characters. The greater part of the Americans, officers as well as foldiers, had never feen any fervice, were ignorant of their duty, and but feebly impressed with the ideas of union, subordination, and discipline. To form an army of such materials, fit to take the field against British veteran troops, was the talk affigned to General WASHINGTON. In effecting this, he conducted with fo much prudence, as to make it doubtful whether we ought most to admire the patient, accommodating spirit of the man, or the confummate address of the general.

The American troops were only engaged for a few months' fervice, and were in a great measure destitute of ammunition. On the 4th of August, 1775, and for fourteen days after, the whole stock of powder in the American camp, and in the public magazines of New-England, was not sufficient to make ten rounds a man. Under all these disadvantages, the commander in chief adopted such efficient arrangements, as protected the country, confined the British army to Boston, and sinally obliged them to evacuate that city on the 17th of March, 1776. His conduct was so pleasing to Congrefs, that they ordered a medal to be struck, with suitable devices, to perpetuate the remembrance of the great event; and so much to the satisfaction of the people of Massachusetts, that he was presented with a most slattering address from their Council and House of Representatives.

Hitherto General Washington had embarked in the war with the fond idea of a reconcilement with the parent state. Independence was an after-thought, forced on the Colonies by the refusal of Great-Britain to redress their grievances. Though he was not among the first to embrace the scheme of independence, yet as soon as he perceived the necessity of the measure, he heartily came into it. Far from wishing such a turn of affairs, as must necessarily lead to his personal aggrandizement, as long as one ray of hope remained, he ardently panted for such a return of moderation and wisdom to the rulers of Great-Britain, as would have united the two countries in their ancient habits of union and friendship.

Soon after the evacuation of Boston, General WASH-INGTON, with the army under his command, took their position in New-York. Great were the difficulties he had to encounter at Boston, but much greater pressed upon him in New-York. In the former situation, he commanded a force far fuperior in number to the enemy: in the latter, his whole army was fhort of 18,000 men; and of these a great proportion was militia. To these were opposed upwards of 30,000 British veterans, supported by a powerful navy. In this situation, after much thought, General Washington refolved on a war of posts. He stood his ground, as long as it could be done, without risking too much, and then prevented the last extremity, by evacuating and retreating. He rightly judged, that to him, delay was victory; and not to be conquered, was to conquer. By this policy, he wore away the campaign of 1776. Though the British counted on the complete conquest of the Colonies in that year, it was the middle of September before they got footing in the city of New-York, and beyond the middle of November before they obtained full possession of New-York island.

The evacuating and retreating fystem, adopted by General Washington, subjected him to the clamours of short-sighted politicians, who questioned his decision and spirit. He had it always in his power to have vindicated himself, by stating the inferiority of his numbers, and the total unfitness of his raw troops to contend with the veteran force opposed to them; but with true magnanimity he bore those reproaches, and concealed his real situation.

In the latter end of November, the British commanders, instead of retiring into winter quarters, after driving the Americans from the State of New-York, pur-ing the Americans from the State of New-York, purfued them into New-Jersey, with the fair prospect of annihilating their whole force. The moment was critical. Dangers and difficulties pressed on all sides. On the fixteenth of November, 2700 of the American army were taken prisoners in fort Washington. fourteen days after that event, the flying camp, amounting to 10,000 men, having ferved out their time, claimed their discharge. Other whole regiments, on similar grounds, did the fame. The few that remained with General Washington scarcely exceeded 3000, and they were in a most forlorn condition, without tents, or blankets, or any utenfils to drefs their provifions. Under all these disadvantages, they were obliged to confult their fafety, by retreating towards Philadelphia, from a victorious army, preffing close on their rear. As they marched through the country, scarcely one of the inhabitants joined them, while numbers were daily flocking to the royal army for protection. Not only the common people changed fides in this gloomy state of affairs; but several of the leading men in New-Jersey, and Pennsylvania, adopted the same expedient. Congress fled from Philadelphia to Baltimore. The hearts of many brave Americans began to fail, and to give up all hope of maintaining their independence.

In this period, when the American army was relinquishing their General; the people giving up the cause; fome of their leaders going over to the enemy, and the British commanders succeeding in every enterprise, General Washington did not despair. He slowly retreated before the advancing foe, and determined to fall back to Pennfylvania-to Augusta county in Virginia-and, if necessary, to the westward of yonder Mountains, where he was refolved, in the last extremity, to renew the struggle for the independence of his While his unconquered mind was brooding on these ideas, 1500 of the Pennsylvania militia joined him. With this small increase of force he formed the bold refolution of re-croffing the Delaware, and attacking that part of the enemy which was posted in Trenton. Heaven fmiled on the enterprise. On the 26th of December, 900 Hessians were killed, wounded or taken prisoners. This bold enterprise was, in eight days after, followed by another, which was planned with great address. General Washington with his army stole away under cover of the night, from the vicinity of a force far fuperior to his own, and attacked in their rear a detachment of the British posted in Princeton: 300 were taken prisoners, and about 100 killed and wounded. These two victories revived the drooping spirits of the Americans, and seemed, under Providence, to have been the means of their political falvation. They made the British fo cautious of extending their posts, that General WASHINGTON, with an army of 1500 men, for feveral months, kept nearly 15,000 of the enemy closely pent up in Brunswick.

The fame wife policy of avoiding decisive engage-

The fame wife policy of avoiding decifive engagements was purfued by our Hero through the campaign of 1777, with fo much effect, that it was as late as the 26th of September before Sir William Howe possessed himself of Philadelphia. In the various marches and counter-marches which took place between the two armies, in the course of this campaign, repeated proofs were given, that though General Washington was forward to engage, when he thought it to his advantage, yet it was impossible for the royal commander to bring him to action against his consent.

I claim your indulgence for recapitulating fo much of the history of our late revolution, which is already known to you all. It is no digression. It is all to my purpose. When General Washington is the subject, history and eulogy are the same; the speaker praises him best, who gives the most faithful narrative of his actions.

If time permitted, I would run over every campaign, and point out to you, in each, the many instances in which our Hero displayed the talents of an accomplished general, as well as the mild virtues of the father of his country. I would particularize how eager he was to attack, when it could be done to advantage; and with how much dexterity he avoided engagements, when his fituation was unfavourable. With what address he kept together a half naked, half starved, and unpaid army, particularly in the last year of the war, when gold and filver were banished from circulation, and the continental currency had depreciated almost to nothing. I would unfold how the magic of his name produced union and concert among the jarring States, and their discordant troops. I would-but time fails me even to enumerate the topics, from which, by the simple relation of facts, I could heighten your admiration of this extraordinary man. I shall, therefore, conclude my observations on his military career, by obferving, that in consequence of a most judicious plan, in concerting, and executing which, General Washington had a principal share, Lord Cornwallis, with 7000 men, was, in October, 1781, compelled to furrender to the combined forces of France and the United States. This was the clofing fcene of the revolutionary war. At Trenton the first, and at York-Town the last decifive blow was given to the British forces in the United States, and both were conducted under the immediate command of General WASHINGTON.

Though the capture of Lord Cornwallis, in a great measure, terminated the war, yet great and important fervices were rendered to the United States, by our General, after that event. The army, which had fought the battles of independence, was about to be disbanded without being paid. At this period, when the minds of both officers and men were in a highly irritable state, attempts were made, by plaufible but feditious publications, to induce them to unite in redreffing their grievances, while they had arms in their hands. The whole of General Washington's influence was exerted, and nothing less than his unbounded influence would have been availing, to prevent the adoption of measures, that threatened to involve the country in an intestine war, between the army on the one fide, and the citizens on the other. If WASHINGTON had been a Julius Cefar, or an Oliver Cromwell, all we probably would have gained by the revolution would have been a change of our allegiance; from being the subjects of George the Third of Great-Britain, to become the fubjects of George the First of America.

The war being ended; the peace, liberties, and independence of these States being acknowledged and fecured, our beloved General presents himself before Congress, and returns into their hands his commission as Commander in Chief of their armies. The scene was grand and majestic. After having successfully served his country for eight years, and conducted its armies through a revolutionary war, which terminated in the establishment of the liberties and independence of these States, when he is about to retire to private life, does he demand honours or emoluments for himfelf, family, or friends? No fuch thing. In modest language, he recommended to the favourable notice, and patronage of Congress, the confidential officers who were attached to his person. For them, he indirectly asks favours, but nothing for himself. The only privilege conferred by Congress on the retiring Washington, which distinguished him from any other private citizen, was, a right of fending and receiving letters free of postage. Think not, I mean to charge my country with ingratitude. Nothing would have been refused to him, which he wished to have; but to use his own language on another occasion, "he shut his hand against all pecuniary compensation."

Do you ask me, how this illustrious General, after being used for eight years to camps, bore the languid indifference of private life?' Do you inquire, whether he went to Europe in a public or private character? Had he been a vain man, fond of applause, or of glittering in the public eye, he would doubtless have put himself in the way of receiving those flattering attentions, which are fo eagerly coveted by the vulgar great. Very different was the line of conduct he purfued. After refigning his commission, he hastened, with ineffable delight, to his long-neglected farm at Mount Vernon; sheathed his fword; laid aside his uniform, and assumed the dress and habits of a country gentleman. With the fame affiduity he had lately vifited camps and forts, he began once more to vifit his fields and his mills. In a short time, the first general of the world became the best farmer in Virginia.

Do you inquire, on what subjects this great man, after retiring from an exalted public station, used to converse? Was it his practice to "fight his battles o'er again," and entertain his company with a recital of the great scenes in which he had been a principal actor? Ask the many gentlemen who partook of his hospitality, and they will one and all tell you, that he rarely spoke of the war, and still more rarely of himself, unless his squests forced conversation upon these subjects. His savourite topics were agricultural; on these he dwelled with peculiar pleasure, and rejoiced in every opportunity of giving and receiving information on the first and best employment of man. In this beloved retreat, from the cares and business of public life, he wished to fpend the remainder of his days; but, after having enjoyed himself on his farm for four years, his country again called for his fervices.

From the inefficacy of the articles of Confederation, and from feveral other concurring causes, a tide of evils flowed in upon the United States, in the years that immediately followed the return of peace. A Convention of the different States was called, to digest a form of government, equal to the exigencies of the Union. To this illustrious affembly General Washington was deputed, and of it he was unanimously elected president. His wisdom had a great share in forming, and the influence of his name a still greater in procuring, the acceptance of the Constitution, which the Convention recommended to the people for their adoption. By this, one legislative, executive, and judicial power was made to pervade all the States, and the executive in particular was committed to an officer, by the name of Prefident. Though great diversity of opinions had prevailed about the merits of the new Constitution, there was but one opinion about the person who should be appointed its fupreme executive officer. Three millions of people, by their representatives, unanimously gave their fuffrages in favour of GEORGE WASHINGTON, Unambitious of further honours, he wished to be excufed from all public fervice; but that ardent patriotifm, by which he had always been governed, prevailed over his love of retirement, and induced him once more to engage in the great work of making a nation happy. The popularity of his name, and the confidence which the people of all the States reposed in his tried integrity, enabled him to give an energy to the new Constitution, which it would not have had under the administration of any other person.

I need not remind you of the great improvements which have taken place in the wealth, refources, and commerce of the United States fince Washington has been Prefident. You know them, you feel them; and the daily increasing prosperity of our country attests

In the midst of this prosperity, a storm arose in a far diftant land, which threatened to involve these States in its wide fpreading devastation; but our political pilot once more faved us from impending danger. When the war broke out between France and England, an artful minister was sent from the former, with the avowed defign of involving us in the contest. The kindred name of a republic; unbounded love and gratitude to France for beneficial aid, afforded us in our struggle for independence; rankling hatred of Great-Britain for the many injuries she had done us in the fame period, all concurred to make a strong party among us, favourable to the views of the French minifter. This was increased by impolitic and illegal cap-tures of our floating property, by the vessels of his Britannic Majesty. When we were apparently on the point of being drawn into the vortex of the war, Prefident Washington, by virtue of his constitutional powers, prevented it. He nominated an envoy extraordinary to negociate with the Court of London. This, like the veto of a Roman tribune, put a stop to all further proceedings; for the legislature could not proceed to hoftile measures while the executive was negociating. The man, who, in his military capacity, had faved us from Great-Britain, now, in his civil character, faved us from ourselves. The people, though divided in parties, were fo fully convinced of the rectitude and purity of the conduct of WASHINGTON, that on a fecond election they elevated him to the fame exalted station, with an unanimous voice. If my time, or your patience, permitted, I would go over the civil adminiftration of our late President, and point out to you his judicious arrangements for making us happy at home, and respectable abroad; for protecting our commerce; for encouraging our agriculture; for giving vigour to our internal police, by calling into office upright and able men, in every department. I would dilate, with particular pleafure, on his unwearied endeavours to pre-ferve the country in peace. While fome of our citizens were for France, and others for England, Washington was for the United States, and with great address preferved us on both fides from the horrors of war.

On these subjects I cannot dwell, and therefore hasten to observe, that, after having served his country with great ability, and sidelity, for eight years, in the office of President, he once more retired to private life, covered with honours, and followed by the love and gratitude of all the people. Previous to this event, he gave his last parting advice to the citizens of the United States, in the form of a valedictory address. This is in all your hands. Teach it to your children, in the house, and by the way, lying down and rising up, going out and coming in. It is an invaluable legacy. Perhaps there never was so much important instruction, so much good advice, given by any mere man, in the compass of so see words, as was done by Washington on this, and a similar occasion, when he retired from military command.

Our departed friend had not enjoyed his beloved retirement two years, when his country again called for his fervices. The rulers of France having entirely departed from the principles on which they fet out, plundered our commerce, infulted our ministers of peace; and some of their agents went so far as to threat. en us with invasion. This imposed a necessity to organize an army, and prepare for the last extremity. All the world knew, and Washington, though the most modest of men, could not but know, that his name, at the head of our army, would either deter any European power from invading us; or, if they should madly make the attempt, would unite all our citizens as a band of brothers for the common defence. He therefore accepted the appointment; and, though on the verge of threefcore years and ten, flood ready and pledged to take the field, whenever the necessities of the country required it. In this attitude, and with a fixed resolution to serve his country in the last ebb of his life, and with the last drop of his blood, our father has been fuddenly fnatched from us. To lofe fuch a man, at fuch a crifis, is no common calamity. Well may you mourn on fuch an occasion. Well may you shroud yourselves and your churches in black. Well may the citizens of these States, from New-Hampshire to Georgia, mingle their tears in one great flood of grief. It was wise and proper to set apart a day, free from business and care, to give undisturbed vent to your forrows. Who now will wield the fword of our country against our enemies? Many brave and good officers we yet have; but none, like Washington, can by their very names strike terror into the breasts of an invading enemy. None, like Washington, can unite all hearts and hands in the common defence.

Having finished an historical review of the life of our departed friend, bear with me a few minutes while I attempt to draw his character. For the sake of those who have never seen General Washington, it may be worth while to observe, that his person was graceful, well proportioned, and uncommonly tall. When he was cheerful, he had a most engaging countenance; when grave, a most respectable one. There was at all times an air of majesty and dignity in his appearance.

His learning was of a fingular kind; he overstepped the tedious forms of the schools, and by the force of a correct taste and sound judgment, seized on the great ends of learning, without the assistance of those means, which have been contrived to prepare less active minds for public business. By a careful study of the English language, by reading good models of sine writing, and, above all, by the aid of a vigorous mind, he made himself master of a pure, elegant, and classical style. His composition was all nerve; full of correct and manly ideas, which were expressed in precise and forcible language. His answers to the innumerable addresses, which on all public occasions poured in upon him, were promptly made, handsomely expressed, and always contained something appropriate. His letters to Congress; his addresses to that body on the acceptance and refignation of his commission; his general orders as Commander in Chief; his speeches and messages, as President; and above all, his two farewell addresses to the people of the United States, will remain lasting monuments of the goodness of his heart, of the wisdom of his head, and of the eloquence of his pen.

The powers of his mind were in some respects peculiar. He was a great practical felf-taught genius, with a head to devise, and a hand to execute projects of the first magnitude and greatest utility. Happily for his country he was not under the dominion of a warm imagination; but he potleffed, in an eminent degree, what was of infinitely more confequence, a correct, folid judgment. This was improved by close thinking, and strengthened by daily exercise. Possessing a large proportion of common fense, uninfluenced by prejudice, passion, or party spirit; deliberately weighing, in the balance of a found judgment, the possible and probable confequences of every step he took, and being always under the influence of an honest, good heart, he was imperceptibly led to decisions that were wife and judicious. It is not pretended that he was infallible; but it may, with truth, be afferted, that in the multiplicity of bufiness, on which he had to decide, his errors were as few in number, as venial in their nature, and as unimportant in their confequences, as could reafonably be expected in the present imperfect state of the wifest and best of men.

Enemies he had, but they were few, and chiefly of the fame family with the man, who could not bear to hear Ariftides always called the juft. Among them all, I have never heard of one who charged him with any habitual vice, or even foible. There are few men of any kind, and ftill fewer of those the world calls great, who have not some of their virtues eclipsed by corresponding vices. But this was not the case with General Washington. He had religion without austerity; dignity without pride; modesty without diffidence; courage without rashness; politeness without affectation; affability without familiarity. His private character, as well as his public one, will bear the ftrictest scrutiny. He was punctual in all his engagements; upright and honest in his dealings; temperate in his enjoyments; liberal and hospitable to an eminent degree; a lover of order; systematical and methodical in all his arrangements. He was the friend of morality and religion; steadily attended on public worship; encouraged and strengthened the hands of the clergy. In all his public acts he made the most respectful mention of Providence, and, in a word, carried the spirit of piety with him, both in his private life and public administration. He was far from being one of those minute philosophers, who believe that "death is an eternal sleep;" or of those, who, trusting to the sufficiency of human reason, discard the light of Divine Revelation.

To dwell on all the virtues of General WASHING-TON, would protract my oration beyond the going down of the fun. I must therefore confine myself to a few. Among the many that prefent themselves, his patience and fpirit of accommodation deferve par-ticular notice. He had to form foldiers of freemen; many of whom had extravagant ideas of their personal rights. He had often to mediate between a ftarving army, and a high spirited yeomanry. So great were the necessities of the foldiers, under his immediate command, that he was obliged to fend out detachments to feize on the property of the farmers at the point of the bayonet. The language of the foldier was, "Give me cloathing—give me food, or I cannot fight—I cannot live:" The language of the farmer was, "Protect my property." In this choice of difficulties, General WASHINGTON not only kept his army together, but conducted with fo much prudence, as to command the approbation both of the army and of the citizens. He was also dependent for much of his support on the concurrence of thirteen distinct unconnected legislatures. Animofities prevailed between his fouthern and northern troops; and there were strong jealousies between the States from which they respectively came. To harmonize these clashing interests—to make uniform arrangements from such discordant sources and materials, required no common share of address: Yet so great was the effect of the modest, unassuming manners of General Washington, that he retained the affection of all his troops, and of all the States.

Bravery is indispensable in a military man, though it stands lowest in the least of the virtues of a great officer. Our hero possessed a great stare of it. In battle he was the bravest among the brave. When the service required it, he cheerfully risked his person. Of this I could enumerate many instances. I could particularly relate, that on New-York island, and at the battle at Princeton, he was so far in front of his troops, and exposed to so much danger, that the preservation of his life can only be accounted for by those, who believe in a particular Providence. Having so many more important matters before me, I cannot dwell on this subject. How rich in reputation must that General be, whose courage must be thrown in the back ground, to give place for the display of his more important virtues!

General Washington also possessed equanimity in an eminent degree. One even tenor marked the greatness of his mind, in all the variety of scenes through which he passed. In the most trying situations, he never despaired, nor was he ever depressed. Propositions, supported by plausible assignments, were made to him by honest, but despairing, timid Americans, to save himself and his country, by negociating at the head of his army; but in the lowest ebb of affairs, he spurned at every such proposal. The honours and applause he received from his grateful countrymen, at more fortunate periods, would have made any other man giddy; but on him they had no mischievous effect. He exacted none of those attentions; but, when forced upon him, he received them as favours, with the politeness of a well bred man. He was great in deserving them, but much greater in not being elated with them.

The patriotifm of our departed friend was of the most ardent kind, and without alloy. He was very different from those noisy patriots, who, with love of country in their mouths and with hell in their hearts, lay their schemes for aggrandizing themselves at every hazard; but he was one of those, who love their country in fincerity, and who hold themselves bound to confecrate all their talents to its service. Numerous were the difficulties with which he had to contend. Great were the dangers he had to encounter. Various were the toils and services in which he had to share. But to all difficulties and dangers he rose superior; to all toils and services he cheerfully submitted for his country's good.

Poffeffing an ample, unencumbered fortune; happy at home, in the most pleasing domestic connexions; what but love of country could have induced him to accept the command of the American army in 1775? Could it be hatred of Great-Britain? He then ardently loved her, and panted for a reconciliation with her. Could it be partiality for a military life? He was then in the forty-fourth year of his age, when a fondness for camps generally abates. Could it be love of fame? The whole tenor of his life forbids us to believe, that he ever was under the undue influence of this passion. Fame followed him, but he never pursued it. Could it have been the love of power? They who best knew the undissembled wishes of his heart, will all tell you with what reluctance he was dragged from a private station, and with what inessable delight he returned to it. Had he not voluntarily declined it, he would have died your President. Others have refigned high stations from difgust; but he retired at rather an early period of old age, while his faculties were strong, and his health not much impaired, and when the great body of the people fincerely loved him, and ardently wished for his re-election.

Could it have been the love of money that induced him to accept the command of the American army? No fuch thing. When he was appointed Commander in Chief, Congress made him a handsome allowance; but in his acceptance of the command, he declared, "that as no pecuniary confideration could have tempted him to accept the arduous employment, at the expense of his domestic ease and happiness, he did not wish to make any profit from it." "I will keep," faid he, "an exact account of my expenses; these, I doubt not, you will discharge, and that is all I desire." At the close of the war, he produced his accounts for the eight years it had lasted, all in his own hand writing, and with the same exactness that was required of commissaries and contractors. The whole amounted to f. 14,479 18s. 9d.3 fterling. Of this fum, about one seventh was for secret services. The amount paid, the time when, and the occasions on which monies were advanced for fecret fervices, were all carefully noticed; but for obvious reasons, no receipts were produced. For every other item of the account, the most regular vouchers were exhibited. The whole, at the request of General Washington, was minutely examined by the proper accounting officers, and regularly passed. A tin box, containing these accounts, remains in one of the offices of the United States. It is a monument of the difinterestedness of General WASH-INGTON. Bring your children and your children's children to examine its contents. Shew them the hand-writing of the father of their country; teach them thereon lessons of economy, of order and method in expenses; teach them to love their country, and to ferve it on liberal terms.

I call upon antiquity, upon modern Europe, and especially on the recent republic of France, to produce one of their heroes or statesmen, that can surpass, or even equal, our difinterested patriot.

Had I a voice that would reach across the Atlantic, I would address the nations at war, and propose to their emperors, their kings, their directors, their generals, and their statesmen, the example of our Washington for their imitation; and call upon them, if not too much abashed by the splendour of his virtues, to learn from him to put far away avarice and ambition; and, like him, to pursue nought but their country's good. If they would thus copy after the great example of our American hero, they would soon sheath their swords, and let the world have peace.

But chiefly do I call on my fellow-citizens, to cherish the remembrance of the virtues of the dear deceased. To learn from him to be all eye, all ear, all heart and hand in the service of your country; to think no facrifice too great, no labour too hard, which public good requires at your hands. Rehearse to your children, and instruct them to rehearse to theirs, the noble deeds of your common father, and inspire them with a holy resolution to go and do likewise. His great example, thus improved, will be a germ of virtuous actions through succeeding generations, till time shall be no more.

But to return. The fame reafoning will apply, with still greater force, to General Washington's acceptance of the office of President of the United States. No motives, but those of the purest kind, could have induced him, loaded with honours, and possessed of a reputation, that had carried his name to the remotest corners of the globe, to quit his beloved retirement for the second time, and embark on the perilous sea of civil life.

Where shall we find words sufficient to do justice to his self-denying acceptance of his recent appointment to the supreme command of the army that is now raising? View him in the possession of all that his heart could wish; in the fixty-seventh year of his age, when repose and retirement must have been not only desirable, but even necessary. View him, under all those circumstances, pledging himself to take the field, whenever the situation of his country required it. How ardent must have been his patriotism! How great is the loss which we have sustained!

In losing him, our people have lost their guide; our country has lost its father—its sword and shield—its greatest benefactor and ornament. Rome, with all her heroes; Greece, with all her patriots, could not produce his equal. Not one, who trod the stage of life with equal dignity, and who departed from it in old age with a reputation so brilliant, and at the same time fo spotless.

His virtues and example are an invaluable legacy to his country, to Europe, to the world. His counfels are engraven on the table of our hearts; his deeds are written with a pen of iron and with the point of a diamond. His fame is a fea without a fhore. His counfels, his deeds, and his fame, will live forever. But, alas! those eyes, which have watched so many nights for the safety of the United States, are now closed in death; that tongue, and those hands, which have so often, so long, and so successfully been exerted for our benefit, are now mouldering in the dust.

No more will he enlighten our councils by his wifdom—No more will he lead our armies to victory—No longer will his name prove a bulwark of defence, by giving us one mind and one heart, and by ftriking terror into our enemies. For these things, our hearts are faint; our eyes are dim and run down with water.

This day is a day of trouble and diftress; a day of darkness and gloominess; a day of clouds and thick darkness—But I check myself—Washington's worth, and our forrows, exceed all speech. I am therefore silent, that we may muse on his merits, and indulge our grief.
